The legislative reference movement also had an important effect on the American library profession, a point implied but not sufficiently emphasized by Casey. The bureaus were a major impetus to the special libraries movement and, in 1909, the creation of the Special Libraries Association. The SLA, with its focus on putting knowledge in all formats "to work," was itself a reform movement within American librarianship. McCarthy was indeed, as the author notes, "an early information scientist." He was also, in effect, one of the founders of the special libraries movement.

McCarthy was a historian by training. A student of Frederick Jackson Turner at Wisconsin, he received a Ph.D. in 1901. But a university position was not available to this unorthodox man who had both a working-class demeanor and a brogue. He was, however, recommended for a position in the documents office in the state capitol; it was this modest office that the ambitious, socially conscious "digger into truth" soon transformed into the Legislative Reference Library.

McCarthy's professional career was relatively short, apparently one reason why his contributions to the Progressive movement and to librarianship have been overlooked. After thirteen years in his library in Madison, McCarthy accepted a series of information-related positions outside librarianship: researcher for the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, assistant to Herbert Hoover on the Food Commission, and assistant to Felix Frankfurter on the War Labor Policies Board. The jobs were information related because he made them so, insisting that the information he gathered and presented could ultimately lead to an improved American society. His career ended with his death, at the age of forty-seven, in 1921.

This is a clearly focused study of an intriguing and influential personality. It also is a thoughtful exploration of the relationship between the Progressive movement and the roots of a specialized and important branch of American librarianship. It is unfortunate that it has been produced from camera-ready typescript; in my view, it deserves better treatment.—John Y. Cole, Stanford University Libraries, Stanford, California.
At Midwest Library Service, We Take The Team Approach To Assist Your Library

To best serve your needs, we have formed five problem-solving service teams to help take the hassle out of book-buying. Each team is composed of a Sales Representative in the field and a Customer Service Representative in our home office.

Once alerted by your phone call made on our Toll-Free WATS Line, 1-800-325-8833, (Missouri customers, please call COLLECT 0-314-739-3100) your problem-solving team, geographically assigned to your library, goes into action immediately.

It is another facet of Midwest Library Service's tradition of excellence. May we have the privilege of serving your library?

"23 Years of Service To College and University Libraries" ity of the scholar, is a hard thing to admit. Shiflett has more than adequate documentation for this finding.

It is also somewhat painful to have so clearly documented the fact that the kind of education that librarians and their academic institutions accepted "... differed radically from that expected of faculty members. Indeed, the form of library education as it was begun by Dewey and promoted by his disciples was, in essence, a manifestation of the spirit of the public library movement." So much for the strength of the historical influence as regards academic status for librarians.

In Shiflett's words: "As a profession distinguishable from that of members of the faculty and from other types of librarians, it (academic librarianship) has failed to become fully defined." Rather, I would say that, after reading Shiflett, the definition might well be before us. Now all we have to do is admit it—academic librarians warrant status on their own account. Shiflett has provided us with plenty of food for thought.—Russell Shank, University of California at Los Angeles.

One of the many undercurrents of academic librarianship is the persistent notion that small-college libraries have special problems which cannot be treated easily. Somehow the environment and limited resources of the typical host institution seem to impose peculiar restraints on the library's potential for achieving success. This perception is especially evident among those librarians who view the difference between college and university settings as basically a matter of scale. Fortunately, most of the people who contributed essays and studies to the publication reviewed here recognize the unique and exciting challenges afforded by a venture into college librarianship.

This is a modest book which offers the reader an opportunity to reflect on such vexing issues as "Collection Development from a College Perspective," "The Challenge of Cataloging in the College Environment," and "Equal Employment Opportunity and the College Library Administrator." Two of the eighteen articles were published earlier in C&RL, but the rest of them are fresh contributions to the relatively sparse literature on the subject. In all, they serve as a good introduction to a variety of topics handled by college librarians on a daily basis.

The most refreshing articles are those that attempt to come to terms with the special characteristics of the subject in a general manner. Peter Dollard's overview, entitled "A Paradigm for College Libraries," is a remarkably thoughtful attempt to delineate the special role of the college library. Susan Lee offers a superb planning strategy in "A Modest Management Approach," while Charles Maurer describes the underlying paradox of mixed responsibility for line and staff functions with "Close Encounters of Diverse Kinds: A Management Panorama for the Director of the Smaller College Library."

Other articles focus on topics such as faculty status, acquisitions, personnel, media resources, user instruction, government documents, archives, and planning a library building. In all, the editors have assembled a serviceable treatment of the subject.

This volume should be useful to library school students and others who may wish to obtain greater knowledge of the real issues faced by college librarians. It may also serve to identify some topics for research in an area of librarianship which some people feel has not received enough attention.—Richard A. Olsen, Rhode Island College, Providence.

This report is the result of a study conducted by the Aslib Research and Consultancy Division and funded by the British Library Research and Development Department. The aim of the study was to provide ratios of library-information staff to users in the special sector (excluding public library and educational sectors). These ratios are intended to be of use in forecasting and planning at both the national and organizational...
